What are connected vehicles, and why do we need them?

Author: Poornima Apte

A growing number of consumers want their connected vehicles to function as a Wi-Fi hotspot. They want to be seamlessly connected to the internet while they are in their vehicles, making the car an extension of their homes or offices.

This might explain accelerating demand. By 2022, the world is projected to see more than 125 million connected cars, a 270% increase since 2018. But what exactly are connected cars, and what are their benefits? And how can you access Wi-Fi in a car, also known as a car hotspot? Here's what to know.

Like what you're

7

How to create a car hotspot

By 2025, it's estimated that about 70% of U.S. drivers will be driving a connected vehicle. Having so many connected cars on the road will require a network that can speedily and reliably accommodate high internet traffic volumes. 5G will help, as it can deliver low latency, massive capacity and ultra-fast speeds at scale. As its coverage expands, it will empower more vehicles to enjoy high-performance hotspots than ever before.

Consumers looking to set up a car hotspot will need to contact their wireless service provider to see what plans they can use or add on. The ability to set up a connected vehicle will also depend on the car make and model, so it is best to check with the dealer and see what additional hardware, if any, might be needed.
